This invention relates generally to a foundation for a building construction. More particularly, the foundation incorporates a precast concrete block wall in combination with a concrete slab and piers. Even more particularly, the invention relates to a foundation incorporating a footing, a precast concrete block wall, a concrete slab and piers, each of which is designed to reduce the impact of high winds on the foundation of a building structure. Various types of structures are employed for supporting the foundation of a building. For instance, piers have been employed that are inserted into the ground and upon which the building is then supported. Another type of foundation is a precast concrete slab, which is supported by steel piers and which is generally supported by a wooden subgrade to which concrete is poured to form the slab, which is finally covered by a finished, finishing concrete. Regardless of the type of foundation used, there is always a need for a stronger foundation to withstand high winds and other environmental forces, which are often applied to the structure. For instance, even in regions, such as the northeastern United States and northwestern Canada, where it is considered to be acceptable for building foundations to be situated on wooden piers, it is generally accepted that building foundations be situated on concrete piers. The concrete piers are usually reinforced with metal. Moreover, the concrete piers are usually embedded in a concrete slab. One problem with embedding the concrete piers in a concrete slab is that concrete is generally considered to be an extremely poor conductor of high frequency sound energy. As a result, building foundations situated on concrete piers are often susceptible to cracking and failure if impacted by high frequency sound energy, which is generally produced by power lines and may be produced, for instance, by loud airplanes flying by. There remains a need in the field of building construction for a foundation structure, which is superior to existing structures. A precast concrete block wall, which extends from an excavation in the ground to the ground surface of a building structure and which has at least one cavity extending for the width of the wall, is provided. A concrete slab is defined in the foundation and the wall includes slots, which communicate with the cavity of the wall. The cavity is generally positioned between two recessed panels that are set back a distance, which is less than the width of the wall. The concrete slab rests against the precast concrete blocks of the wall and the precast concrete blocks are spaced apart from the concrete slab by a portion of the distance between the panels. Concrete is poured into
