It said household bills had risen faster than incomes since the financial crash and that the average family saving was £360 a year. People on the lowest incomes were least able to afford a return on their money, the consumer group found. The analysis showed the "economic benefit" of a household being on the frugal side was £80 a year, not that much when compared to the average total bill of £2,028. The report said: "The poor benefit from saving a little less, but the rest of us benefit from saving a little more. "It is clear that the financial markets have been falling through the saving rate, because this is what you need to be saving to avoid an expensive electricity bill." The Which? report said its figures suggested that consumers were missing out, but the government must to work harder to help people to save more. It said: "The government must do more to help people save more, including dropping the tax on basic savings. "If you take into account the government's tax and benefits changes, people will miss out on saving an average of £1,200 a year as a direct effect of rising energy bills and a £3,000 income from a tax and benefits change which will make savers even poorer." Which? urged ministers to reconsider planned energy bills in this year's Autumn Statement. A spokesman for the Department of Energy and Climate Change said: "Nearly two-thirds of British households now save towards their energy bill, at a time when high energy prices threaten to push up bills further.
