More information Defects in the ER-associated degradation of misfolded integral membrane proteins. The ER is the main organelle in eukaryotic cells responsible for protein folding, maturation, lipid modification, and assembly of both transmembrane and soluble proteins. To face this enormous task, the ER has evolved an elaborate machinery for processing and disposing of aberrant proteins, which are otherwise toxic to the cell. The resulting quality-control system, ER-associated degradation (ERAD), is highly sophisticated, but the detailed molecular mechanisms are still under active investigation. This review provides a general overview of the major cellular pathways involved in ERAD. In particular, special emphasis is placed on recent advances that have shed new light on the mechanistic aspects of ERAD and have led to a deeper insight into the intricate functions of the membrane proteins that are degraded in this compartment. We've been eating oatmeal and granola lately and I've been having so much fun making it for him. I will usually put a big pinch of cinnamon on top of my granola then dip a spoon in honey and pour it over the top. But then I thought of a great new take on it! I topped my granola with cinnamon and granola crunch cereal and drizzled honey over the top. If you like granola I've made it easy for you with my Pinterest board. It includes the oatmeal, granola, and even some breakfast cereals I've tried. This granola is great for little eaters too since it's low in sugar and just a big bowl of fresh granola. You can also use this recipe in many different ways as well. You can make it into anything from granola bars to breakfast cereal. Give it a try and be sure to share your creations with
