2018-11-07T23:19:00-07:00 2017-12-12T14:00:00-07:00 Apple has once again set its developers to work, this time in an effort to eliminate the distribution of counterfeit Apple equipment on college campuses. A recent Apple employees' survey offered up some interesting data regarding the company's interest in higher education and the use of proper equipment by students and instructors. Apple seeks to eliminate 'counterfeit' student-owned Macs Apple's survey asked whether students had been seen working with "Macs, PCs or iMacs" on college campuses. The results were not good for students, with 97 percent of respondents saying that they knew of someone with "a counterfeit or non-genuine Mac." Students were also asked whether they had sold or sold course material, such as study notes, and whether the students knew anyone else who did the same. And, just in case college administrators are worried about schools becoming hotbeds of Mac piracy, 81 percent of respondents said that they knew of someone who had been able to "sell or give away" Mac software. All this data, combined with anecdotal evidence such as a 2007 issue of the The Inside Higher Education Newsletter that reported on a student who had won a $700 Apple iPad from a campus radio station, was enough to get Apple's attention. "Once you have the data it's not something you have to work at," Apple told The Register. "You simply get on top of it. It may not be something the company can directly solve but it creates a stake in the ground for campus administrators." So what did Apple do? It compiled an updated list of what the company considers to be the most popular Apple products on college campuses and produced a video aimed at teaching staff about the issue. "Staff need to know the difference between counterfeit Macs and genuine Macs," reads the video. "They need to understand that many of the supply chain partners we talk about in the video... are legitimate, reliable businesses. And those that aren't need to be held accountable." The video also points out that college administrators have a responsibility to their students and the community as a whole: "It's our expectation that students use authentic Apple products for the duration of their college career, and beyond," says the video. As usual with Apple, the product is actually designed to be used by Apple employees.
