Q: Are there specific, known ailments that can result from long-term mild dementia? We just lost our grandmother who lived through the Eisenhower administration. We know from experience that people lose memory as dementia advances (not to mention cognitive function). There's a huge question about how much memory loss is normal for a person. But I can't find a lot of information on this: Are there known ailments that might result from prolonged mild dementia, particularly one that might (and I'm not sure it does) lead to losing all memories of the past (fear of the future), losing all relationships, and presumably losing all aspects of identity. It's important that the initial dementia be mild. The heart ailments that sometimes manifest in advanced dementia are presumably not known to be produced by a mild form of dementia, but that's not the case for the results of a mild dementia. A: Amnesia of some form in the elderly is not uncommon. It can range from being able to remember events over a few minutes to a few seconds to being completely unable to remember anything from the past. If you want to know what affects are able to alter or cause this in older people, there are some things that can cause amnesia in older people that are more common than dementia. alcohol being physically or emotionally abused physical trauma from any cause substance abuse (alcohol and drugs can affect memory and learning in the young and old) brain damage / tumor / epilepsy anoxia (when there is insufficient oxygen flow to the brain) Amnesia can also be caused by psychological disorders. There are plenty of other things that can also cause amnesia. The lists that I have are not the exhaustive list, but the ones that are the most frequently encountered and easily recognized. Physical abuse and brain damage and tumors are things that you are likely to be able to recognize from other symptoms. etching and the molecular weight distribution thereof.
