GitHub GitHubThe overarching goal of this proposal is to identify a new locus that is causal for familiar epilepsies in humans. Familial epilepsy is one of the most commonly encountered forms of epilepsy, making it challenging to identify. The de novo dominant Epilepsia Polychromatica (EPP) and the autosomal dominant Familial Frontal Temporal Dementia (FTD) are two well-characterized forms of EPP and FTD, respectively. In addition, a number of other EPP cases have been reported. Evidence for linkage to specific genes for these and other forms of EPP exist, supporting the view that these epilepsies are caused by the malfunction of a single or small number of genes. However, in general, these EPP and FTD genes have a very low penetrance and there are usually multiple affected members of a pedigree, making linkage studies difficult to interpret. Furthermore, it is not well established that the same epilepsy gene is causal for more than one form of EPP or FTD. Here we describe a large pedigree with 4 individuals affected by EPP and FTD. The pedigree shows Mendelian inheritance of the disease, with two of the four children (who share a copy of the rare c.1070-1071deKGT mutation in the EEF2 gene in the beta-1 subunit of cytop
