Ask HN: As a one-person software development team, where is the bottleneck? - strukturfekt I am a developer and I've got an idea for a webapp, which I'm developing myself. I managed to bootstrap the first prototype, which is working now, but I'm really not happy with the UI of the app at this point. I also think that the idea is lacking and I'm not sure whether I should just let it go and only finish the app for a (for me) completely irrelevant reason. I can't accept the idea that this app will not turn out well because of me. It's something that would make us all a bit richer and I want to push it to the next level and I believe that I'm the guy who can do it.Of course I can find some developers to help me and I know it can work, but I'm also interested in understanding what I can work better on my own.Does the problem lie somewhere else in the project? What would you do if it were you? ===== nb What do you think is important about this app? A lot of software development is a question of not waiting for the perfect first iteration and iterating as soon as the features are mostly finished (from a business perspective). For example, it doesn't make sense to wait until your average revenue is perfect to build it--you need something to be built for now--and if it's actually very hard to monetize it (i.e. get enough traction), then it's probably going to be a distraction f30f4ceada
