incumbent in her New York primary last month, is a "self-proclaimed socialist" and a "young prodigy of the Bernie Sanders wing of the party," National Review's David French notes. In other words, she's exactly the sort of leftist we warned Trump voters would take over the party last November. And it's already begun. Here's more from

French: The first thing to understand about "socialist" is that, to the extent to which we recognize socialism as an economic concept, it is not the ambitious, broad-scale, economically sophisticated notion that many progressives espouse specific feature. Efficient upgrade of photosystem I during catabolite repression in Pichia pastoris. Fermentation of ethanol from glycerol in Pichia pastoris is more efficient than from glucose as the substrate. This increased efficiency is mainly due to a reduction of the photosynthetic energy dissipation in the light reactions of the photosynthesis-photosystem II pathway, caused by a decreased activity of the mitochondrial alternative oxidase. Here, we show that the most drastic effect is a 30% reduction of the activity of the reaction center of photosystem I. Electron microscopy and immunoblotting showed that the production of LHCI in wild-type cells decreased under the reducing conditions of glycerol-feeding. To study the regulation of production and degradation of PSI in relation to light, we used photosystem I mutants that were impaired in its degradation by oxidative damage and/or by proteolysis. The mutant with only one proteolytic site (L135Q) had a higher amount of

LHCII than the wild type and also had wild-type amounts of PSI in the dark. This indicates that the degradation is not a limiting factor for the synthesis. The mutant with three active proteolytic sites showed similar amounts of LHCII and PSI as the wild
