Recently I had to find a way to migrate a very large repository of data from an old CentOS server to a new server. I also had to migrate all the passwords that were used for the files and folders inside the repository. I have this repository on a folder `/home/user/MyRepository`. The repository has 20,000+ files, most of them are over 2MB, while others are much smaller. The old server had this repository on `/home/user/OldRepository`. The password of this repository was also stored in a `password.txt` file. The `/home/user` directory on the old server was a symbolic link to `/home/user/OldRepository` on the new server. The new server only has enough disk space to store one more repository, so I moved the repository to `/home/user/NewRepository`. The file

`/home/user/OldRepository` was deleted and then I copied the contents of `/home/user/NewRepository` to `/home/user/OldRepository`. Once the migration was completed, I found that I had to change the access rights of all files and folders in the repository to ensure that the permissions and ownership of all files and folders inside the repository was unchanged. Although I'm experienced in Linux, I'm new to CentOS. I had no idea what kind of software package I could use to achieve this task. I also wanted to ensure that I didn't lose anything in the migration. In Windows I have Filezilla to change all access rights of files and folders, but I couldn't find anything like this in CentOS. So I checked the CentOS 7 User's Guide and
