Tolstoy, Tolstoy's Wife and Children The remote place in which Tolstoy was born and raised would not seem an unusual setting for the first novel of a novelist. A remote place for a novelist is a land devoid of roads and people, a land where no one eats dinner at five, no one dines at eight, and no one dines again till well after midnight. There is no musical instrument in the barn except the one used to hold horses; there are no daily newspapers, no great novelists; there is no Paris, there are no English women—none but poor Russians whose "countless womenfolk" are used to feed the cattle. There are no cities, only the quiet of earth and sky. In this remote place, Turgenev's father lived, in the year 1840, poor, morose, sick, with a pious wife and two handsome children. In 1847 the father died. Since the death of a father the mother had lived alone with her husband. Then came a second father for her children. In the same year Tolstoy was born. As a child Tolstoy was loved and understood. He was, as it were, embalmed in books. The books were read to him aloud by an old peasant woman. Tolstoy loved her so much that he is reported to have broken down a door to get to her when she sat with him, just as soon as he had learned to read. From her he learned to read; and thus he became the first of Russia's reading population. Cossacks, Russian peasants, and milk were Tolstoy's milk. They were his type of people, his people, and he loved to study them. When he grew up he was a soldier and a Cossack. He lived on an estate near Yasnaya Polyana, in the villages surrounding Yasnaya Polyana, near those humble people. His studies were both religious and philosophical. And this, then, was the atmosphere and milieu in which Tolstoy's first novel was written. "My Wife and Children" is the first story Tolstoy ever wrote, and it is a reflection on the first chapter in every life's book. Tolstoy was a reader, especially of good authors, and this is his understanding of the mental attitude of his characters, in his own time. He was a reader, and his art is reflected in this book. All human souls are readers.
