Description of the Related Art Communication systems, such as wireless radio frequency communication systems, have an inherent requirement for accurate power control. An example of such a system is described in U.S. Pat. No. 7,675,813. In a communication system, as in other related communications systems, a transmitter sends out radio frequency (RF) signals to a receiver. The receiver then processes the RF signals to make them intelligible to a user. There is an inherent need for the transmitter to provide adequate signal power to the receiver to enable processing of the RF signals by the receiver. These changes may occur on a regular basis, such as from one hour to the next, or they may be infrequent, such as from one day to the next. When the power supply is greatly changed, this change in power supply level may cause a substantial change in the power level of the RF signals which are being transmitted by the transmitter. In a communication system, as noted above, RF signals are being transmitted and received. In a communication system, such as a communication system used for internet protocol (IP) routing, a transmitter may be associated with an Internet Protocol (IP) router which includes a receiver. When a power supply changes, the amount of RF signals that are received by the receiver may be greater or smaller than the amount of RF signals which are provided by the transmitter. If a power supply changes before the transmitter has reached the limit level or power which can be provided to the receiver, the receiver may
