Regional assessment of the influence of seed supplementation on carbon and nitrogen storage in yellow and white kidney bean (Phaseolus vulgaris L.) using stable isotopes. The value of N and C stable isotopes to assess the value-added impact of legume seed supplementation on the digestibility of human dietary protein has been well documented. However, the study of the stable isotopes in the biologically significant storage organs of these pulses remains underutilized. This study attempts to quantify the value of N and C isotopes in the seed and pod tissues of yellow and white kidney bean (Phaseolus vulgaris L.) for assessing the impact of defoliation on seed production of these pulses. There was a significant effect of defoliation on seed production, resulting in significantly higher accumulation of protein, fat, fiber and K in the seeds with the lower defoliation levels. However, there was no differential effect of defoliation on stable isotope composition of these storage organs. In contrast, defoliation significantly increased N storage, but not C, in the seeds. In the pods, there was differential effect of defoliation on N and C storage. Although, seed N had been significantly higher than C with increasing defoliation levels, the C storage in the pods was significantly higher than N, with greater accumulation in dry seeds than in wet seeds. Across both the seed and pod tissues, defoliation significantly increased N isotope enrichment due to higher stable isotope fractionation factor, thus, resulting in a higher %N2 than %N1. This study demonstrates that stable isotopes in seed and pod tissues can be used as a complimentary tool to assess the influence of defoliation on legume seed production. This information can be used to make better decisions for the appropriate level of defoliation in these pulses at the stage of pod initiation.
