God said, 'Let there be lights in the expanse of the heavens to divide the day from the night; 4th Edition Answer Key. An integrated approach to assessing circadian disturbance in liver transplant recipients. Circadian rhythm disorders, both arrhythmias and circadian misalignment, are common in liver transplantation recipients (LTRs) and manifest as sleep-wake instability, insomnia, and fatigue. Given the high incidence and significant impact of these symptoms on quality of life, an assessment that could identify LTRs with circadian rhythm disorders would be a valuable tool for post-transplant evaluation and patient management. We assessed circadian rhythm disturbances in a cohort of 45 LTRs. The patients underwent a structured interview about sleep-wake instability and insomnia, including assessments of timing, and fatigue was measured by the Fatigue Severity Scale. We measured cortisol, melatonin, and thyroid hormones in a random subset of 20 LTRs and collected saliva samples for a melatonin metabolite in a subset of 15 LTRs. The authors used a statistical approach known as phase mapping to assess whether a better fit was achieved by combining data from both groups to form a single data set. The present analysis includes 42 subjects, of which 33 (78%) had biomarker data. An integrated phase mapping analysis was the best fitting model. The majority of subjects had a clock delay that was associated with cortisol, melatonin, and thyroid levels. The next largest group had a clock advance, most likely indicating circadian rhythm misalignment caused by a forced circadian misalignment protocol. The remaining group showed no apparent circadian rhythm disturbances. The symptoms of fatigue and sleep-wake instability reported in this cohort were associated with circadian rhythm disturbances. This integrated approach may be used as a method to assess circadian rhythm disorder
