The UK's National Physical Laboratory (NPL) released a paper on Tuesday that aims to define "the baselines that should be achieved in the future" for the measurement of time and frequency against atomic clocks. The goal is to raise the standard of time to 1 second every 18 years and frequency to 1 Hz every 18 years by 2025. The paper notes that the Earth's time is measured from a reference point in space and that this is known as the UTC (Coordinated Universal Time). UTC, however, is not an official name. Rather, it is used to refer to the system of time measurement that is determined and coordinated by the International Bureau of Weights and Measures (BIPM). The BIPM's measurements come from astronomical observations of the rotation of the Earth and the motion of the Earth's orbital speed. Another method uses measurements from very precise atomic clocks. The NPL paper says that the time and frequency of the time and frequency standards are monitored by a suite of 28 tests, six of which are based on atomic clocks. This paper is the NPL's way of updating earlier work by BIPM that identified different levels of quality expected of time and frequency standards. It is more comprehensive, putting time and frequency to the test on a global scale. The paper identifies the standards that are already in place or planned and which meet the requirements of the published standards, as well as those not yet available or planned that will eventually be required. The paper says that standards for any or all of the six tests could still be lacking. This is highlighted by the fact that some facilities do not meet the accuracy goals for all of the tests but do perform adequately for some. In contrast, standards are already in place for a number of the tests, which are considered well developed and stable. A number of facilities have been delivering these standards for many years, the paper states, and there is "a high degree of confidence that they will continue to do so in the future". The paper doesn't name individual facilities, but does say that many of them have recently undergone a redesign that "significantly reduces the limitations of their operation". One example is the NPL's NPL-1A, a 9.9-kg ultra-stable caesium frequency standard which has proven to be reliable for more than half a century. Another is the NPL's third generation caesium fountain atomic clock, CS
