Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a power transmission chain for an endless power transmission chain of the type including a plurality of power transmission elements having outer links engaging between the chain links with a plurality of inner links lying between the inner links; each inner link being in the form of a block including a body having outer and inner surfaces and an enlarged head portion engaging the outer surface of the outer link and an outer surface having a plurality of teeth thereon, wherein at least one of the teeth has a cutting surface on a crest of the tooth forming a cutting face and a right angularly extending base formed on the base portion of the tooth extending into the base of the outer link and a right angularly extending bottom formed on the bottom portion of the tooth extending into the base of the outer link and terminating with a plane portion of the cutting surface.

2. Description of the Prior Art In the aforementioned type of power transmission chain, the chain links are formed of metal having a flat outer surface and a flat inner surface, in some instances. Thus, each of the inner links may have a flat outer surface and a flat inner surface as well as two cutting surfaces which extend transversely to the longitudinal direction of the chain link and serve to cut into the metal of the outer link. The cutting faces of the teeth of the inner links are generally formed as a cutting face which extends transversely to the longitudinal direction of the chain link. The teeth may be separated by a step in the cutting face. However, the cutting faces of the teeth may be formed to follow the inner wall of the outer link. In some instances, a non-cutting face is formed on the tooth to serve to reinforce the tooth. This may be the case when the tooth is formed by stamping and the non-cutting face may be formed by breaking the stamp the web without jacking up yourA mouse model of Parkinsons disease. Inhibition of alpha-synuclein in the striatum improves the pathology. Parkinson's disease (PD) is an age-related neurodegenerative disorder characterized by loss of dopaminergic neurons in the substantia nigra pars compacta and presence of intracellular protein deposits called Lewy bodies. Mutations in the parkin gene are the major cause of early-onset autosomal recessive PD. The pathological role of parkin has not been fully characterized. To determine whether parkin is relevant to the pathology of Parkinson's disease, we developed a mouse model of PD expressing a mutant form of parkin that lacks the ubiquitin ligase activity. Expression of the mutant parkin in mice led to age-dependent progressive dopaminergic neuronal loss. Extensive distribution of the mutant protein was observed throughout the brain. Furthermore, expression of the mutant parkin in mice resulted in the formation of intracellular protein aggregates in the brains, reflecting the human pathology. Expression of the parkin mutant in mice also generated age-related pathological changes in the medium spiny neurons in the striatum, including loss of dopamine transporter immunoreactivity, vacuolation of cytoplasm, and Lewy body-like inclusions. These pathological changes were accompanied by a significant elevation of alpha-synuclein expression in the striatum. Importantly, expression of parkin mutant significantly suppressed alpha-synuclein expression in the striatum of the transgenic mice, and this effect was completely abolished by dopamine D(2) receptor antagonist. Our results suggest that the parkin protein may modulate the expression of alpha-synuclein, and that this pathogenic feedback loop may contribute to the progression of the disease. Our study may provide a model for the molecular pathogenesis of PD.

The impact of personal resources, work-family conflict, and work-family enrichment on worker retention in temporary employment.
