Platelet glycoprotein Iba1 antibody, concomitant with the activated protein C resistance factor, increases risk of thrombosis in a mouse model of thrombosis. In type 1a von Willebrand disease, the slow correction of the von Willebrand factor (VWF) abnormalities may predispose to thrombosis. Treatment of this disorder is complicated by the lack of a reliable assay to measure VWF antigen in patients and a high prevalence of antiplatelet IgG1 activity that neutralises the functionality of both the VWF and platelet receptor glycoprotein Ib (GPIb). A deficiency or low function of activated protein C (APC) is another recognized propensity to thrombosis. GPIIb/IIIa is a platelet receptor for VWF, which co-localises with GPIb. We investigated an hypothesis that the low GPIIb/GPIIb/IIIa ratio in platelets may increase the effect of anti-GPIIb/IIIa, APC resistance factor (ARRF) on platelets and coagulation. In addition, the ristocetin-induced platelet aggregation was studied. The study showed a low levels of GPIIb/IIIa along with the high concentration of thrombin-induced APC resistance factor in thrombocytopenic mice. In vivo, a small inhibitory dose of the ristocetin (0.3 mg kg(-1)) induced a strong endogenous irreversible platelet aggregation in thrombocytopenic mice. This response was partially abrogated by a treatment of APC (17.5 mg kg(-1)), which also restored a normal concentration of GPIIb/IIIa and inhibited the effect of ARRFs on platelets. Platelet GPIIb/IIIa and
