The new features include the ability to control the movements of players on the pitch based on real-life data. This technology was used to create new and more realistic animations for referees, players, balls and more. There are new injury-recovery systems that are more action-driven for in-game conditions, and a variety of new animations, such as exaggerated sprints, tackling and tackles. Finally, the Playersync feature enables players from real leagues to play as themselves in the game. Read on for more about FIFA 22 in our feature on EA's official FIFA blog. The full game releases on June 21. Key features of FIFA 22 A revolutionary engine with HyperMotion Technology New card presentation, animations and visual styles New set of features for the Create-a-Club Improved Ultimate Team experience New player and training modes Improved rewind system A new Series Mode New Training and Player Management Improvements to Casual, Training and League games FIFA "Player Movement" engine Player movement is the most central aspect of FIFA 22 gameplay, and the new Player Movement engine (PME) is being built on the core gameplay first principles of FIFA as a game of control and passing. The elements of movement, positioning, and player control are being coupled with a physics engine that replicates real-world physics on a larger scale to enable unprecedented physics-based player movement on the pitch. Among the key elements of the new gameplay engine is the ability for players to have full control of on-ball actions - dribbling, passing and shooting - as well as regaining the ball out of possession. Based on data collected from thousands of high-intensity, full-speed football matches, the Player Movement engine uses real-world player motion to power gameplay. Physically-based control creates greater control, decision-making, ball possession and on-pitch action. A fully reworked rendering system creates photorealistic, high-resolution visuals that give players a more detailed, true-to-life feel on the pitch and more eye-catching set pieces. AI intelligence in the on-pitch arena and specific off-the-ball play has been improved, and players react more intelligently and realistically in critical situations such as fouls and counterattacks.
