Players can now be controlled with natural movement, making every pass, tackle, dribble and run that much more responsive and responsive. In addition to better touch, movement and animations, in-game actions such as passes, tackles and dribbles now react faster to make every in-game moment feel fresh and realistic. "The human element that moves FIFA into the next generation is what we have all been working on for the last two years," said David Rutter, senior producer at EA Sports. "Everyday in the studio we have been developing new mechanics to be able to capture all of the player's attributes, each one different, each one individual. We are telling a richer story, and making sure that every football game is an authentic, football game." I'm really excited about it. It'll be a massive leap forward in terms of human player interaction in football. Going beyond the functional improvements that we've seen with each game generation, we have really tried to imagine what the game is like to be a player, to feel like a player, to feel like you are in control, and we're really proud of that. I think everyone will be happier in the long run. FIFA has lost many fans over the years because of its one-dimensional approach to player interaction. At FIFA 21, we wanted to ensure that the game felt like a living, breathing organism. I hope this is a step in the right direction to start restoring that lost fan base and making FIFA a top player in the sports game market once again.Q: Javascript: why does it error when passing it a string function instead of a function function? Here is the example: var n = 1; (function() { console.log(n); })(); (function() { console.log(n); })(); Why does the 2nd example give an error? Is it because functions have to have a name? If so, why do the first example and the 3rd example have different outputs? A: Because the first statement declares n as a "name". It essentially creates a unique variable in the function, meaning that when you call the second statement the values stored at the time of the first statement is no longer there. If you want to have a more consistent output change the 2nd statement to
