This feature is something like what's introduced in Player Impact Engine 2 in FIFA 18, but in FIFA 22, the data is being used to create realistic-looking player animations with unprecedented levels of dynamic realism and player individuality. The results are even more impressive than I've seen before with the addition of HyperMotion to FIFA 22, so I had a chat with EMA's Senior Multiplayer Designer, Matt Bell and Online Lead Designer, Alex Kraft to find out more. Matt Bell: This year has been very strong for us on the single player side, and also some of our gameplay features have become more and more important to matchmaking. It was important for us to have a big online experience, which started with FIFA 17 and then continued here with FIFA 18. We've had a lot of discussion internally about how to best keep those innovations going in your future. What we realized is that we had the opportunity to deliver a much larger online experience this year with the introduction of Player Impact Engine. And we've been really pleased with how it's gone so far. We've also seen the increased success of eSports. FIFA is seeing record viewership numbers, and more people are watching and playing competitive FIFA multiplayer than ever before. And we haven't even talked about the FIFA Ultimate Team additions. So we felt like we had all the right things going in the right directions. It was at that point that we started to discuss the future, and whether there were some other areas we could do some experiments and innovate in. With the game engine, there are so many areas that we're always able to push the envelope in. Players and pundits have been doing great things with their video content, while the top FIFA players are still showing us new innovative ways of getting better. All these things pointed towards a direction of creating the best online multiplayer experience we could with the Player Impact Engine. So we started talking about some of the great features we have already released, and looking at some of the new features we have on the way. And one of the big ones for us is HyperMotion Technology. It's been on the cards for a long time and we couldn't just wait any longer. We need to innovate more than we ever have before, and we want to push the game engine even further than we have before. We want to look at where we can make the most impact,
