singing. Along the fence lines, farmers were out planting their spring bulbs. A gentle breeze blew. And, in the distance, the rumbling of a train.

On this, his last afternoon, George decided to skip lunch. But then it occurred to him that the muffuletta sandwich that he had had at lunch might be a little tight, so he put away the rest of his food. So much for that. George was in a reflective mood, and he brooded about his recent life: the lost child, the stolen money, his deeply felt love for Irna and for his running-dog colleague, Donnell, and the prospect of the approaching heart surgery. Then, as he walked, he tried to figure out how he might escape from it all. It was a sunny day in New Orleans. Up ahead, he heard a train whistling for a crossing. He turned that way and watched the train coming, and a thought came into his head. To hell with it. Maybe it would be an adventure. George crossed the railroad tracks and waited for the approaching train. He stood there on the track, with his hand raised, and he stepped out to meet the oncoming train. And, as it drew near, the doors of the locomotive opened. And George was standing on a steam engine. And the engineer was looking down at him. And then, the train slowed down. And George and the engineer were alone on the track. And they were silent for a while. George thought about his life, about his lost child, and about the fact that he had ignored the inner call of the priesthood
