What is Photoshop? Photoshop is an image-editing application that allows you to correct exposure, correct color, crop, add special effects, and otherwise polish images. As a photo editing software, it is used by many different professions from photo retouching to graphic design. Who uses Photoshop? Photoshop is used by photographers, designers, and even illustrators. It is also used for post-production of other commercial and non-commercial video software including Adobe Premiere Elements, Final Cut Studio, Final Cut Pro, and Avid Media Composer. While it is primarily a photo editing application, it can also be used for architectural and three-dimensional design, logo design, graphic design, and just about anything where an image is digitally manipulated. Where is Photoshop available? Many laptops run Photoshop, but you can also download an image editing program for free at the time of this writing. Applications like Paint Shop Pro and Corel PaintShop Pro are available for free for home use. How do I use Photoshop? Once you have Photoshop installed on your computer, it is ready to use. There are many simple and advanced tutorials on YouTube that explain how to use the features of Photoshop for beginners. However, if you want to edit your image, you will need to know how to use a mouse and scroll through your image in Photoshop. What are the Main Types of Images? There are two main types of images in Photoshop—raster and vector. Raster Images have pixels that are one color per pixel. Vector images have geometrical shapes or lines that are held together by lines. These shapes can be placed anywhere. Raster images are best for pixel-doubled images since they do not have to be resized when cropped. Raster is the preferred method for graphic design, including logos and advertisements. Vector images are best for images that have geometric shapes and lines. Each vector shape can be placed at any scale and any position. What is the Difference between Raster and Vector Images? A raster image consists of one color per pixel. A vector image consists of geometric shapes that have transparent areas. You can create a vector image by clicking the pen tool and drawing or by using the computerized shapes in the Photoshop Shapes palette. A raster image consists of one color per pixel. To get the best out of Photoshop Elements you'll have to learn how to use it. The following tutorial will help you get started. How to use Photoshop Elements in a computer? If you're using Photoshop Elements, you'll need a computer to save and work on images and other files. Depending on your needs, you can use a desktop computer, a laptop, or a mobile phone for work. For your convenience, here is a table that shows you the main points to consider when buying a computer: What do you need? What can you do? How will it fit into your life? If you're buying a laptop, make sure you get a computer with a fast processor to make working on your images and other files quickly and easily. You'll also need at least a 4 gigabyte (GB) hard drive to store your images. This is a basic requirement for all computers. Also, you might not need to have a lot of storage space for a laptop. A SSD or an external hard drive can be a much better option. If you're buying a desktop, you'll probably need a better processor, memory and bigger hard drive space. You'll also need to consider how much of a budget you can set aside for a new computer. In any case, you'll have to consider all the specifications in this table and choose the right model or models for your needs. Once you have the specifications of the computer you want to use, make sure you check all the compatibility issues to make sure you're not going to have any trouble with it. If you're on a budget, it's a good idea to make sure 9b3c6dd9d5

Senator Robert Widen from the State of New Mexico recently introduced a bill that would reduce the amount of lead and cadmium found in children's toys and drinking water. By requiring manufacturers to build new plants using alternative technologies to those currently used, the reduction of hazardous metals in products would be significantly improved. The Senator's bill, entitled, "An Act Preserving Our Children's Health and the Environment by Increasing the Hazardous Substance Ban," gives special treatment to the hazardous metals used in consumer products. Importantly, the toxic metals can be found in children's toys, as well as in our water. In addition, this legislation also establishes tougher requirements for the leaching of hazardous chemicals from manufacturing processes ("leaching byproducts," collectively known as "MERR substances"), and specific energy efficiency standards for those facilities. Keep in mind that this bill would not only reduce kids' exposure to toxic metals, but would also save the planet. The Energy Information Administration recently estimated that costs of carbon pollution, from the use of fossil fuels, would increase the price of electricity by about $2.50 per ton.¹ Meeting President Obama's pledge to cut carbon pollution 25 percent below 2005 levels by 2025 would lower electricity costs by $475 billion. ² As a graduate of the University of Virginia, Senator Widen understands that our children's health is a top priority. For this reason, along with the other Senators and Congressmen introducing similar legislation in their states, he is urging other lawmakers to introduce the same bill. Here are some of the top achievements made by lawmakers in their states: Provide rewards of up to $10,000 to persons who inform law enforcement and child protective agencies about hazardous-materials violations that endanger children. Ban the sale of children's products made with hazardous substances, and require retailers to prominently label products made with these substances. Ban the sale of children's products that contain heavy metals that can make their way into the tissues of young children. Ban the use of hazardous substances in products and work practices that could harm children. Establish minimum federal hazardous-substances standards. Establish federal requirements for the safe handling and disposal of dangerous chemicals. Tax the manufacture, importation, and sale of hazardous substances. These proposals are the beginnings of many steps that could help to protect our

Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama have expressed their support for the

Colombia peace accord struck earlier this week between the government of President Juan Manuel Santos and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC. "I congratulate President Santos on his agreement with FARC leaders. It was a big step forward in Colombia's peace process, and we welcome the goodwill with which the process has been undertaken," Clinton said in a statement to the Associated Press. Obama has "made it clear that he'll support the deal and "U.S. involvement will be instrumental in helping Colombia achieve the enduring stability and prosperity it requires as a result of this important accord." "The agreement with FARC is a good step forward in the Colombian peace process, and demonstrates the strong will of all Colombians to achieve peace," he added in a statement. "The United States will support the agreement as the best path forward in Colombia's peace process." The agreement was announced July 13 in Havana, Cuba, and two days later Santos, the president of the country since 2010, met with his FARC counterparts, Rodrigo Londono and Carlos Antonio Santeiro. The peace accord has been roundly condemned by Colombian political leaders, with many calling it an embarrassment to the nation and leaving Colombia's poor, marginalized and rebel-supplied camps devoid of security and without a reprieve from violence. The People's Party and the Liberal Party announced they would withdraw their support for the deal in an extraordinary session of Colombia's congress on Thursday, accusing Santos of failing to consult enough lawmakers prior to announcing the accord. But the vote is not scheduled until Oct. 17, meaning that the agreement could remain in place. "We must not forget, though, that they were never the only ones accused of criminal activities," said Andrés Velásquez, a human rights activist and member of the independent think tank Observatorio Democrático Consultivo. "The government has also been accused of not carrying
