"It's so obvious to me they're just doing this for money." When the officers from the San Marcos police department arrived at the clinic, it was clear that Roberts was in pain. His legs were wrapped in a towel, he was bleeding from the nose, and his head was so swollen, he couldn't even open his eyes, Davis said. The officers tried to force Roberts to leave the clinic, but he resisted. The officers then stopped treatment and arrested Roberts. "They were only taking care of people who they thought would not have a legal standing to sue," Davis said. "They were making judgments." Davis told HLN that Roberts suffered a fracture to his skull, which caused the severe swelling he showed on his head. There was also a large lump on the back of his head where he suffered multiple lacerations. The incident occurred at a time when open drug testing was in place at universities across the United States. UCLA, the University of Minnesota and Ohio State University were all implementing the program in their athletic programs, Davis said. Davis said that Roberts has no memory of the incident and that several months later, he awoke in the hospital with amnesia. Roberts' family took him to the clinic after an emergency room visit for his head wound, Davis said. Many of the treatments Roberts received were covered by the university's student health insurance plan, but some of the procedures he received in the clinic were not. Davis said that the university, the campus police and the d0c515b9f4
