solar cells, also called photovoltaic devices, are well known devices for converting solar radiation to electrical energy. Solar radiation impinging on the surface of, and entering into, the substrate material of solar cells creates electron and hole pairs in the bulk of the substrate. These electron/hole pairs are separated by p-n junctions that are formed by doping of p-type and n-type dopants into the substrate on opposite sides of the substrate/dielectric junction. The dopants are generally embedded in the semiconductor by diffusion, ion implantation or epitaxial deposition. Solar cells may be fabricated on a single crystal or polycrystalline silicon substrate or on a silicon carbide, glass, metal or other substrate. Typically, the substrate is of about 500 μm thickness. A conductive grid or a bus bar is typically located on the upper surface of the substrate (the anodes and cathodes are located on the lower surface of the substrate). Radiation that is received at a surface of a p-n junction in the substrate converts some of the energy to electron hole pairs in a process called "external quantum efficiency" (IQE). The junction is essentially a short circuit when electrons and holes combine at the junction. As a result, only a small percentage of the solar radiation that is converted to electron hole pairs reaches the substrate surface.
