Developed by EA's lead FIFA gameplay designer Richard Wallace, HyperMotion Technology brings an array of new player skills and gameplay variety not seen in FIFA titles since FIFA 12. The seamless animations inside the game ensure the best-ever flow of action while the new dribbling system builds on the foundation set in FIFA 16. Players are now able to manoeuvre their opponents into position, sidestep through tight gaps and drag opponents past opponents. Many of the game's existing skills such as speed boosts, interactive quick-turns and reactions have also been revised and improved to increase the dynamic and tactical play that has become a hallmark of the FIFA franchise. As in real life, player positioning, movement and body shape are all factors that influence the outcome of a game. The long-established Player Impact Engine is also being tweaked and updated, allowing for more realistic physics simulations, ball interactions and where the ball might end up when it is hit. All of this is done with the aim of making the ball feel as unpredictable and unpredictable as possible in order to create more variety and excitement during a game.

"When we started playing with HyperMotion Technology, we knew that the core gameplay would be enhanced," says lead gameplay programmer Adam McQuaid. "We wanted to make the game more fun for players, and to do that we needed to make sure that the controls felt even better than they already do - and that was a challenge. We've taken the more technical and complex parts of the controls system and put them in their own area, which makes it easier for players to control how they want to play the game. We've also made some of the minor tweaks to the controls that players may notice." "Physically feeling more like a real-life player brings more exhilaration to the game," adds McQuaid. "We've worked hard to ensure that each and every animation is fluid and brings the unique movements of a person playing football. It was important to us to make sure that the game was more realistic; one of the reasons why we have such a huge range of animations is to help players understand what's going on and why they're doing what they're doing." Wallace agreed that playing with or against friends is not the only benefit from HyperMotion Technology. The technology is also being used to make the game much more enjoyable for players of all
