There are many known ways to produce polycrystalline silicon. The most common commercial process consists of heating a silicon-containing material in a reactor vessel to a high temperature (typically from about 1100xc2x0 C. to about 1200xc2x0 C.) to form monocrystalline silicon. The silicon is then either cooled below the crystallization temperature while still in the hot zone of the reactor and then transported from the reactor to a further processing station, or it is charged to a further reactor or to a holding furnace, reheated to its crystallization temperature, and then transported further. Another process, commonly known as the Siemens process, was introduced in the 1950"'s. In the Siemens process, trichlorosilane (SiHCl3) is reacted with hydrogen at a high temperature (typically from about 1450xc2x0 C. to about 1650xc2x0 C.) to produce highly polycrystalline silicon. The Siemens process uses a batch-type reactor containing a porous support, e.g., alumina, on which the silicon-based material is deposited during the reaction. Heat is supplied to the reactor from the outside by means of a vertical shaft type heater positioned outside the walls of the reactor. The heater shaft is a separate shaft from that which is used to convey the silicon-containing material, and the shaft is generally welded to the inside wall of the reaction vessel. The silicon is formed on and grows on the support material. The material is then withdrawn from the reaction zone by either tilting the reaction vessel to place the solid material at the lower end of the reactor, or by pumping the solid material from
