Oral terbinafine: a review of the new millennium. The last decade has seen a profusion of publications on the new drug terbinafine, which is a semisynthetic, allylamine derivative of benomyl. Early literature describing terbinafine reported primarily on dermatologic disease and emphasized its efficacy for dermatophyte and yeast infections. More recently, however, terbinafine has been considered in the treatment of oral and dental disease, including mycotic disease of the gingiva and periodontium and as an adjunct to the treatment of onychomycosis. This article provides an overview of the pharmacology and clinical studies of terbinafine. Yet another difference between the two is in their sentiment: Plagiarism is often considered synonymous with lying, even though it's usually unintentional. Originality is often considered the goal of creativity. Both words may be more commonly used in English, but "plagiarism" is primarily a legal term while "originality" is a cultural term. A recently declassified National Security Agency document confirms that the Obama administration asked the NSA to look into the health risks of electromagnetic fields from cellphones. Security agency documents obtained by The Guardian and published in full on Tuesday show that it was in 2014 that the Obama administration decided to hire independent researchers to examine the potential health risks of cellphones on humans. The health effects of electromagnetic radiation from cellphones have long been of interest to the NSA, which has been accused by the UN's World Health Organization (WHO) of "extremely high risks" posed by the technology and has been looking into the subject since at least 2013. That the NSA had been studying the issue was revealed earlier this month after a series of documents from the NSA archives were released by document hacking site the Intercept. A formerly top secret paper from the NSA dated to 2013, entitled "USG Reaches Out to Examine Health Effects of Electromagnetic Radiation," a reference to the U.S. Government, highlights a number of agency officials as working on the research and informing the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) of it. The report, which is not dated, provides details of how various government officials were working on the issue and also notes that the FBI and the Department of Energy were also asked to seek input from their own researchers. The NSA officials were quoted as saying that they were investigating the potential health risks "due to the experimental nature and the range of human tissue in which exposures occur". The report drew a number of conclusions, including that "there is a clear potential for risks to health", according to The Guardian. "Most notably, there has been substantial and unexplained public concern over both safety and exposure levels," it reads. The report highlights other
